Richard came on the Mayflower alone, deciding to wait until conditions in the New World were satisfactory before bringing over his family. Bradford's recollection of that time: "Mr. Richard Warren, but his wife and children were left behind, and came afterwards." Richard Church, a carpenter, originally came to Wessagusset (Weymouth) in Massachusetts Bay Colony. He was in Plymouth in February 1631/2 as a "sojourner," or temporary resident, but remained in Plymouth. In 1649, he removed to Eastham, was in Charlestown by 1652 and moved to Hingham in 1654. He served on a number of juries while in Plymouth Colony. His estate included half of a tide mill and a share of the iron works at Taunton.*

“Ambrose Finson Church is virtually unknown, and he still remains a man of mystery; yet his masterpieces, the “Church Maps,” are hailed as genealogical treasures and are unequalled as a genealogy tool. In the States he had been employed with a mapmaker, Jacob Chace Jr., who in 1862 had been dickering with the Nova Scotia government regarding the creation of county maps and had already surveyed portions of the province. On the death of Chace in 1864, Church offered to furnish the maps that Chace proposed. The government of Nova Scotia became interested in map-making in 1862 and contracted Jacob Chace, a mapmaker from Portland Maine for a series of 18 county maps. Civil engineer, Ambrose Finson Church took over the contract in 1865 and relocated from Hartland to Bedford, Nova Scotia for the duration of the work." He had moved to Rio to live with his son Harold soon after the end of WWI where he died of a stroke.

William Richard Cross, “Photographer of the Nebraska & South Dakota frontier, was born in Bennington County, Vermont, in 1839. His older brother, Daniel H. Cross, (a famous Union Army photographer during the Civil War) taught him photography. In 1867, Cross married (Sarah Jane) “Jennie” Church, of Hartland, Maine and they moved to Omaha, Nebraska that same year. He was one of the first professional photographers to live on the Great Plains. Cross and his wife moved to Creighton in 1871 where they spent seven years. Cross took his tent gallery around Knox County photographing the area and its people. Announcements run in the Niobrara Pioneer would notify local people that he was coming to their area. Cross also photographed Native Americans. He belonged to a circle of other professional photographers that wished to satisfy the demand for photographs of Native Americans.”

“On February 14, 1878 Cross and his family left Creighton for the Spotted Tail Agency, which became Rosebud, in Todd County, South Dakota. There they stayed for four or more months so Cross could photograph Native Americans. Cross spent next twelve years, beginning in July 1878, in Niobrara, in northern Knox County, Nebraska. His gallery was opened on July 4, but began traveling again by the end of that month. Cross went to the Santee Agency where the Minnesotan Santee Sioux were moved after the uprising in 1862. These were very productive years for Cross and he was held in high esteem among the local residents.”

“In 1886, after some more traveling to photograph Native Americans in the Niobrara-Valentine area in north-central Nebraska, where Cross met his apprentice, John A. Anderson, he opened a studio at Fort Niobrara. In 1888, Cross and Anderson conspired at Fort Meade, near the Black Hills of South Dakota. Anderson left to become a civilian photographer for the U.S. Army and became a well-known photographer while living on the Rosebud Indian Reservation. Cross spent the remainder of the decade photographing in the Hot Springs, South Dakota area. Cross acquired a gallery that belonged to J.W. Pike in Hot Springs, where he chose to live in proximity to the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation. Toward the end of 1890, there was tension building amongst white settlers and the military in regard to Ghost Dance movement of the Sioux. It was here, on December 29, 1890, on Wounded Knee Creek that U.S. soldiers slaughtered Big Foot’s group of Miniconjou Sioux. No photographers were present for the bloodshed. Although another photographer, George E. Trager of Chadron, Nebraska, was credited with photographing the first images of the slaughter’s aftermath, Cross reportedly visited the site in mid-January of 1891. The number of photographs Cross took on that venture is unknown. After this, Cross did not seem to travel anymore, but kept busy in Hot Springs. He spent time on landscape photography and compiled a sizable collection of Black Hills Views. In November of 1900, Cross opened another studio on Minnekahta Avenue in Hot Springs, where he worked until his death. He died of pneumonia, at the age of sixty eight, on December 23, 1907.”

According to an article in the Hot Springs Weekly, printed on August 1904, “Mr. Cross of this city is a pioneer photographer of the Black Hills Country and occupies a foremost position among business men identified with that line of work.”

Cross had three daughters, Florence, Clara, and Mrs. L.G. (Lillian Gertrude) Miller, and a son, George. William and Jennie’s first child, a son, died before they moved to Creighton. Although many scholars neglect the importance of Cross’s work, he was, according to William C. Darrah, “One of the most prolific and unappreciated western photographers.”
